Blackleg & Malignant Edema

Blacksburg-Virginia cattlemen are being urged to avoid outbreaks of blackleg and malignant edema among their feeder cattle and calves this spring by an intelligent vaccination and management program under the supervision of their veterinarians.

Dr. Keith G. Libke, professor of veterinary science at Virginia Tech, noted that blackleg and malignant edema are two major diseases that pose a constant threat to Livestock owners and veterinarans.

The two diseases, Libke belong to the clostridial class and pose a constant problem throughout the world. "Their distribution is general and their economic importance is great," the vet added.

Blackleg, the Tech professor said, is an acute, infectious, non-cantagious disease primarily of cattle. Occasionally blackleg is found in sheep. The bacteria probably enter through the mucous membranes of the alimentary tract, Libke said. They may sometimes be found in the spleen, liver and alimentary tract of normal animals.

Blackleg occurs in cattle from six months to three years of age, the professor noted, with a high incidence rate during summer and autumn. The rate of incidence is about two to three per cent of the herd with an almost 100 percent mortality rate, Libke added.

In Blackleg, a two to five day incubation period is followed by an increase in the animal's temperature, from 104 to 106 deegrees Faahrenheit. Stiffness, depression and anorexia are noted, the vet said, and areas of the large muscles of the animals body may become swollen, hot and emphysematous. If the animal lives long enough, ghese same muscles may become cold to the touch, he added.

Death from blackleg usually occurs in the animal within 12 to 36 hours after the first signs of the disease appear. With death comes rapid bloating and decomposition, the Tech said.

Malignant edema is a disease of cattle that usually follows a wound infection which leads to a profound systemic toxemic, the Tech professor continued. Malignant edema affects all species of mammals, Libke said, and was the same class of clostridium responsible for the infamous gas gangrene among World War I soldiers.

The bacteria produce a potent toxin in the wound lesion which when absorbed into the bloodstream causes death, the vet said. Malignant edema signs, he said, appear about 12 to 48 hours after infection. The wound site will be swollen, red and edematous.

Also with malignant edema comes a high fever, from 106 to 107 degrees Fahrenheit, along with depression, weakness, tremor and stiffness. Death usually comes within 24 to 48 hours, Libke said. Malignant edema may also be seen after a difficult calving case where the genital organs of the cow are traumatized and lacerated.

Immalignant edema, the Tech vet said, is not toxic in nature involved and a wound can usually be found. Incontrast, blackleg involves the muscle, making it difficult to detect a wound

Careful Planning Needed To Cope With Fertilizer Shortage

As a result of the national effort to increase farm output, all of the 60 million acres of farmland formerly set-aside has been released for production.

U.S. farmers used about 25 million acres of this reserve for agricultural purposes last year, and are expected to use another 10 million or more acres this year. More fertilizer will obviously be needed for this additional planting, but it appears that the industry is not going to be able to meet the full demand.

According th USDA, 42½ million tons of fertilizer was used in 1973, of which 85 per cent went for agricultural purposes. Fertilizer needs for agriculture in 1974 are expected to be 8 to 10 per cent over last year. The industry utilized its full capacity in 1973 and achieved a gain of only 7 per cent; and present indications are that at best only 3 to 8 per cent more can be produced this year, which would barely meet anticipated demand. Nitrogen supplies are considered most crucial, and some farmers may not get all they need.

The fertilizer situation is also acute in Virginia. A survey made earlier this year by USDA's Agriculture Stabilization and Conservation Service revealed that the supply of nitrogen material was either tight or critical in 19 of 60 counties surveyed. Virginia farmers planted 2,792,000 acres last year, and indicate they will plant 3 per cent more in 1974.

All of this means that Virginia farmers must exercise great care in both procuring and using fertilizer for the next few years, or until the industry can expand sufficiently to meet the demand. It is apparent that every effort must be made to use supplies available to the greatest advantage in order to maintain production at the highest possible level.
